Communication is often considered to be synonymous with English speaking skills. This narrow understanding excludes the importance of listening, imbibing, comprehension, and empathy which also characterize communication. It privileges a specific language over many others, and leaves out the most fundamental role of communication. We emphasize through this workshop a culture of communication by showing how to read between lines, appreciate the visual and aural language, and establish dialogue with students and peers. As practitioners of education we explore communication through pedagogy and research and thereby expand the definition of communication. The workshop brings diversity of inputs from individuals who interpret education in unconventional ways.
